1) Identity Politics is Necessary in a Democracy. Identity politics is an inevitability in democracies. In fact, one could question the legitimacy of a democratic country if it did not provide space for identity politics. The existence of identity politics is an indicator of the health of a democracy because it means that marginalised sections are making an active bid for a share of power.

The reason identity politics has taken hold is because Americans suffer deep and abiding guilt, from two main sources: Christianity itself, and the legacy of slavery in this country. What the left could not do through Marxism or postmodernism, it now is doing through identity politics—namely, undermining every institution and every venerable historical memory in America.
